I noted the fine lines of her hands, a little too large and strong, but white and beautifully shaped, the delicate shell like ears which always indicate good blood better than a certificate of birth, sometimes contestible.

Without seeming to notice my scrutiny she settled herself comfortably in her chair, opened her satchel and took out a newspaper. I rubbed my me see what she reads and I will tell you her character and thoughts." I gave the paper a quick glance and to my surprise saw it was a Parisian journal. question?" And she began to talk of Paris with such ardor-such enthusiasm-I said to myself: "This is the string to pull." with almost breathless eagerness; she glad to see you. How I longed to be Then she began to question me wanted to know everything at once.

She ran on for about an hour, then her questions began to be exhausted and it was my time to talk. I related all the stories of the fashionable world I could think of. I gave her a beautiful idea of the grand dames of Paris, satisfied her curiosity in the most fantastic manner, told wonderful adventures of the gay city. She listened with all her ears and all her heart. Then I mocked with cruel irony all those poor women who were bound to husbands who did not appreciate them, and could not understand their delicacy of sentiment The night had come-soft and warm-the great steamer, throbbing from her machinery, glided over the sea-beneath an immense canopy of violet sky, starred with drops of fire. Suddenly my neighbor was up and saying: "It is late. I must retire. Bon soir, monsieur."

I answered: "Bon soir, madame," and she was gone. I knew she must take the night dil-

Then I softly said my hand on hers. It was not withdrawn. Growing still bolder I went on whispering a lot of sentimental rubbish; talked of 'love at first A good many passengers walked up sight," "gindred spirits," etc., with my lips very near her ear-in truth dangerously near her mouth. She was still silent. I fancied I could hear the beatings of her heart, mingled with her gentle sighs.
